Excerpt from Dr. Wampen's: World Renowned System of Anthropometry

To bring a calm contentment to the troubled heart, go forth our book, for thine the power. In making up this posy of culled sartorial bloom, we make no pretence of bringing anything of our own, except the string that holds them together; and if some wormwood be found among the sweeter gems of thought, we sincerely trust that their wholesomeness will make amends for their bitterness, for be it remembered that when we invite a friend to a feast, it is not all sweetmeats that we set before them; we also make it a point to provide something sharp and salt, both to whet the appetite and cause them to taste our wine with increased relish. One of the most prominently interesting characteristic features of the up-to-date and fain would be up-to-date tailor, is his ever insatiable desire to secure the best, that he may be the better able to produce the best. He is ever as anxious to secure the highest class technical knowledge obtainable, as he is desirous of obtaining the highest price for his work; he delights in wearing the best and most stylish clothes, he eats the most sumptuous foods, lives in the most fashionable of residence districts, he aims at working only for the most exclusive intellectually refined, stylish and rich; and when all is secured that is procurable, his ambitious aspirations remain unsatisfied; his heart still yearns for a something newer and better. Excelsior is his never ending refrain. This innate desire of the up-to-date cutter to attain the unattainable has caused many of the smart-witted members of our craft to make a pretence of working out improvements on the unimprovable. In the year 1864, when working at the same cutting table with the world famous Dr. Thos. Darwin Humphreys, who at that time, having conceived the idea of constructing his Angulator System, we asked him: In what way do you purpose working out an improvement on the Wampen ssystem of anthropometry; but there are many in the trade seeking for a something that they cannot get, and my angulator will cause many such who lack analytic ability to believe that in my new work they have secured a new principle in cutting, while I know that I shall only succeed in diverting their mind by a mere diversion of method; obtainable by giving a verticillus twist to the construction lines of Wampen sunimproveable anthropometrical science. Mr. Thos. Hogg Belfast as a young man was especially endowed with a trinity of most enviable virtues, viz.: a high order of intellectuality, rare technical ability and a full measure of industrial concentrative power; we know of whom we speak; we having not only worked as journeymen on the same shop-board, but made halves together, and were fellow students of Dr. Wampen sscience of anthropometry. Mr. Hogg in.
